

How to teach this, a one-page reminder

Keep this with you when you run a session. You already know enough. Teach to the most unsure person in the room, and let people do things with their own hands.

The shape of a session

| Part | Time (2-hour class) | What happens |

|-----|-----|-----|

| Open | 10 min | Welcome, why money matters here, what they will leave with |

| Teach and do | 85 min | Money and why ours fails, what Bitcoin is, set up a wallet, one real Lightning payment |

| Close | 15 min | Questions, where to get help, how to keep going |

| Buffer | 10 min | It always runs long |

Five things that make a good facilitator

1. Do, then explain. Get phones in hands early. People remember what they did.
2. Speak plainly. No jargon. Use local prices, names, and examples.
3. Respect the room. Many have run households and businesses for years. Teach with them, not at them.
4. Keep time. Start on time. Cut depth, never the hands-on part. Protect the real payment at the end.
5. Be honest. "I don't know, let's find out" beats a confident wrong answer every time.

Keeping people engaged

- Ask a question, then stay quiet and wait for the answer.
- Pair people up so the shy ones are helped by a neighbour.
- Move around the room and use names.
- Celebrate the first successful payment out loud. It lifts the whole room.

Mistakes to avoid

- Talking too long.
- Using words beginners do not know.
- Skipping the part where people do it themselves.
- Pretending to know an answer.
- Running out of time before anyone makes a real payment.

When you are stuck

Write the question down. Bring the answer to the next session, or ask your country lead.
Honesty grows trust.

A session succeeds when people leave having done something, not having heard something.
